Staggered Rollout for Innovation Adoption

Abstract

When the adoption of innovation generates information about its value for others, take-up occurs with strategic delay. We consider a principal who wants to reach an adoption target early. For instance, a government trying to reach mass immunity through vaccination while agents are uncertain of their personal vaccination benefits. Even when the principal can monitor take-up, she cannot eliminate strategic delays. We show that it is without loss of generality for her to offer a time-dependent (but not history-dependent) supply rollout plan, that always improves upon free availability, and that these plans are simple, containing fewer batches than the number of types. I also fully characterize such optimal plans for settings with up to three types. The key force driving these characterizations is the competition between agents for scarce supply, that reduces free-riding and speeds up learning. We also show that (non-optimal) supply plans may also be Pareto improving.
